Chocolate Labradors

Makenzie Q. Grade 10

Chocolate Labradors, or “chocolate labs,” are one of the most loved and recognizable dog breeds in the world. They are part of the Labrador Retriever family, which also includes yellow and black labs. What makes chocolate labs stand out is their rich, glossy brown coat and their warm, friendly personalities. They are known for being loyal companions, quick learners, and great family pets that get along with both kids and other animals. Chocolate labs were originally bred in Newfoundland and later developed in England to help fishermen and hunters. Their job was to retrieve fish and game from the water, which is why they naturally love swimming. Even today, chocolate labs are happiest when they have something to do, whether it’s fetching a ball, running around in the yard, or swimming in a lake. Their intelligence and eagerness to please make them easy to train, which is why they’re often used as service dogs, therapy dogs, and even search-and-rescue dogs. However, owning a chocolate lab also means keeping up with their high energy levels. They need daily exercise, mental stimulation, and plenty of attention from their owners. If they don’t get enough activity, they can become bored and may chew on things or get into trouble. Regular walks, playtime, and training help keep them happy and healthy. Overall, chocolate labs are much more than just beautiful dogs, they’re loyal friends and devoted companions. With their playful spirits, intelligence, and loving hearts, they bring endless joy to the families lucky enough to have them.

Chickens

Evret C Grade 9

Chickens are interesting animals with many qualities that people often overlook. They are quite intelligent and surprisingly easy to care for, since all they really need is shelter with nest boxes and roosting bars, food, water, and calcium. It's considered better to have homemade or pasture-raised chicken eggs instead of store-bought ones, as fresh eggs usually contain more vitamins and minerals, such as vitamin D, vitamin B12, and choline. They also tend to have higher levels of omega-3 fatty acids, which are important for heart and brain health.

Chicken themselves are also a great source of protein when eaten in moderation. Three ounces of cooked chicken provide about 26 grams of protein and important nutrients like niacin, phosphorus, and selenium, all which support muscle repair and energy production.

Chickens are not just a food source; they also have emotions and social behaviors. Studies have shown that chickens can feel empathy and experience stress or sadness. Their emotional health can even affect egg production. They can also experience forms of depression caused by loneliness, poor living conditions, or the loss of companions.

Sadly, around nine billion chickens are killed for food in the United States each year. Globally, that number rises to between 70 and 80 billion, which means about 200 million chickens are killed every single day. Chickens also make up roughly 83 percent of all birds used in laboratory testing. Chickens are very useful to humans, they provide eggs and meat, and they are also sometimes used as pets or companions.

French Bulldog

KK Grade 9

French bulldogs live until they are 14 years old and they can still be okay. They are one of the best breeds for staying healthy. French bulldogs are strong dogs; they weigh up to 20 - 33 pounds with most of it being muscle. They are short and fast dogs that can get up to 11-15 inches. French bulldogs are active dogs, and they will move around a lot. They are also big cuddlers. They will snuggle up and sleep with you just like a little kid. French bulldogs have between 2-4 babies. French bulldogs have unique ear shapes, and a small face with a tinny nose. French bulldogs are considered smart, but they are also stubborn. They are dogs that love being outside. French bulldogs are super nice animals. They react with many different animals; French bulldogs are all different colors and with all different designs with cool spots on them. The French bulldog's eye colors are all different but mostly brown. Are French bulldogs a good house pet? Owners typically say that they are a good house pet, but some owners say that French bulldogs are too active and have too much high energy. People get rid of their French bulldogs because they think they are sometimes aggressive, but most studies show that they are not aggressive. French bulldogs should eat three times a day and have water regularly. The biggest problem French bulldogs have is their noses are so small that they struggle to breath out just like pugs.
